Privacy Redirect For Chrome For PC

Privacy Redirect is a cross-browser extension (available for both Google Chrome and Mozilla Firefox) that automatically redirects Twitter, YouTube, Instagram, and Google Maps requests to more privacy-friendly alternatives. The alternatives in question are Nitter instead of Twitter, Invidious instead of YouTube, Bibliogram instead of Instagram, and lastly, OpenStreetMap instead of Google Maps. Some food for thought Clearly, the extension is not all-encompassing (as it's not designed to help keep your privacy safe FROM ALL potential privacy-infringing websites out there), but the idea behind it is definitely interesting. Not only that, but the extension is open-source meaning that its whole code is available for anyone wanting to glance over it in order to determine how legit it is or not. Interesting and unobtrusive extension The extension can be installed just as easily as most other extensions, from the Chrome Web Store. Despite its apparent simplicity, it does offer a surprising amount of options and customization features. For example, you can toggle redirects for specific websites on or off directly from its minimalist GUI. You can also choose between a couple of themes, add exceptions, and even play with some audio and video settings from the More Options menu. Conclusion While there's little chance that this extension will become mainstream, the work and thought process of the person who created it is definitely worth applauding. Overall, Privacy Redirect for Chrome is a nice extension, with an interesting concept behind it, and if you're a privacy-minded person and if you think it suits your needs, then you should at least consider installing it. What's New in the Privacy Redirect For Chrome?

"Privacy redirects non-HTTPS requests to HTTPS, and non-HTTPS requests to a privacy-friendly alternative. " Some ideas/needs addressed: * Consider changing the title to reflect the focus of the extension. It's a bit generic, in my opinion. * Consider adding the option to list redirects in a separate browser tab for a given site. * The extension is not designed to keep your privacy safe from ALL potentially privacy-infringing sites out there, so it's not suitable for that purpose. * I understand that there's no chance of this extension becoming mainstream, but I find the code and the way it's made to be extremely interesting and interesting enough to write a short tutorial on it. * I would also like to mention that this is my first time writing a tutorial so do let me know if there are any issues with my writing style, grammar, etc.! (See all 565 ratings for Privacy Redirect for Chrome) A somewhat small and simple extension that does what it promises without any additional charge, simply copy and paste some websites to the clipboard and when you paste them, you get redirected to a very small landing page for every web page, which includes among other things the web URL, the web page title and the total number of people who have ever visited that page. What's more interesting and useful, the extension is always getting more useful and ever easier to use, the landing page for each website can be accessed by clicking on a tiny "Continue" button, and after the page loads, you can just paste the web URL and close the tab without entering any password. This extension is free, and works on Firefox as well, it's a bit different than other similar extensions, it's very neat and simple, and there's no need to register an account. Limitations: * if you're a power user and sometimes copy and paste more than one website at a time, the tiny landing page for every site will get too small to fit the whole webpage, and will become confusing and difficult to access. (See all 2,416 ratings for Simple Copy URL for Firefox) All right, here it is. I created it, I added it, I improved it, and finally, I published it on the Internet for free for you to use and enjoy. "Smart Clearer", as I named it, is a smart extension that automatically removes all the annoying and unnecessary parts of webpages for you. For example, the time of the day that you are viewing the website is automatically displayed, or the time is displayed and you can change it to any other
