How would you rate the performance of Adobe's own desktop imaging software Lightroom? I am pleased to say that Lightroom 5 has some definite improvements over its predecessor, which was itself an incredible piece of software. The cleaned-up user interface, with new, more clearly recognizable buttons, clearly visible tabs, and intelligent usage of the tool bars, all contribute to a better and easier to use application. And even the limitations of the software are, in some cases, drawbacks. However, the Adobe software has done a much better job of hiding a lot of its rough edges than has their newest photo editor. At least they are less glaring. Layers work better; the tool bars in particular do not do the same thing or look the same as they did before. The Navigation bar is a pleasant-looking and easy to understand and use. Changes on Adjust and Key commands affect the image and are immediately noticeable. Some tools, such as the Burn tool, Add New Layer, Adjustment Brush and Retouch, are quite intuitive, at least to a degree. Still, other popular tools, like Red Eye Removal, Spot Removal, and the Adjustment Brush are a bit harder to figure out. If we also consider the necessity of Adobe to have added some useful new features to keep their customers happy, then I believe that we have some reason to be satisfied with Lightroom 5. If Adobe had added all these innovations to Photoshop, we would have received a 5. What Adobe did is give us a good/fast Lightroom tool that does not steal features from Photoshop and keep the two applications, thus aggravating our confusion, in the same line. Lightroom 5, however, is now a standalone application and does not need Photoshop to function properly. That alone is a big improvement.

Prevent unauthorized saving is a powerful feature that will help you protect newly edited photos, if you're using any external editors (external to Photoshop): this feature allows you to lock the document and save it without the need of attaching the '.psd' file from the editor. This is useful for people who edit a lot, spread a lot of files and leaves it open through different computers without saving. In this case, you can lock the document, save it and then unlock it anytime you want. You can hide the locked image from the file system by changing its permissions with `chmod` to make it read-only and hard to change without the owner's permission.
