Jeff Hoogland, aka Pixelmator Pro took an interesting approach to review Pixelmator Pro. He used his favorite image editing app, Apple's Aperture , as a test subject for the new release. He got a lot of mileage out of the the app, exploring parts of it that were bypassed in the Lightroom approach. Perhaps most notable here is the Lightroom Mobile feature, which could be a great device-based way to share your catalog of images without needing to sacrifice file size and convenience. It's a welcome addition. Remember, I still found a use for it, albeit a fairly limited one. The ability to move text styles for images is nice, but feels distinctly underused. However, it still shows up quite a bit. I found the ability to import from specific types of formats a real boon. However, it's nice to see that the app has the ability to be stripped of all but XMP-based JPEG/TIFF/DNG files, which is appealing to me. In this review I have compared Lightroom 5.2 with Adobe Photoshop Elements 2021 and much of the workflow I've used in previous versions still applies. Adobe recommends downloading the trial version of Photoshop for 20 minutes before upgrading to Lightroom or Photoshop for production work. I suggest leaving all the software, including the trial version, installed and running on your computer to better compare them before deciding to upgrade. The trial version, in My Collections, allows you to compare thumbnails with those created from the Exported Images. If you are brand new to Lightroom, or Photoshop, or both in general, I suggest you first install the trial version and then integrate into it. New programs can be complicated, often don't respond to the mouse, and don't give you much help with familiar commands or designed for better results.
