My advice is this: be worried, and be very curious. If you are worried about a manager, you should ask: What were the most important issues? Have the issues been resolved? Are the issues symptomatic of something in the wider organisation, or are they a reflection of that manager? Do you have any other ideas on how the person could be more helpful? If you are concerned that your employee is in general not very healthy, you should ask: Do they have a well-defined plan to get back to being more healthy? Do they think they can live more comfortably than they actually do? Do they think that if they could make a change for the better, they would do so? If you are satisfied with the answer, ask: What are their most likely obstacles? What have they done to resolve the obstacles? What do you need to know about the specific obstacle that's preventing them from doing better? If you are consistently concerned that your employee is not performing at a standard that you would like, you should ask: Are they getting enough sleep? Are they eating well? Do they have any other symptoms that you need to be aware of? If you still feel worried about them, you should ask: What would they like to be doing? Are they doing what they want to be doing? If they're not performing at a standard you would like, but they are doing what they want to be doing, then the most likely explanation is that they need to be stopped from doing what they want to be doing. These questions are the core of a standard approach to intervention. The job of developing people is to sustain the value in the Organisation, and this is one of the most neglected jobs in any organisation. The role of the manager in a development programme is usually to make sure things get done
